

DREAMS

“The last naturalist who managed to decipher the flight of butterflies could not find rest for the rest of his life, because not only did the poor remain chained to the service of the powerful, but he also found, much to his regret, that the lepidoptera had disappeared from the surface of the planet, and with them all their wide variety of colours. Only a few valuable stuffed specimens were left to adorn the villas of the wealthy.

Then, although aware of the uselessness of his effort, he began to learn the language of flowers because he had realised that, after all, life was a dream”.

At the end of the reading, the teacher looked at his students: some were amazed, others distracted, and the rest were simply asleep.

Collection de micro-stories: “Maybe or Perhaps”

Jesús Claver Giménez