

FULFILLED DREAM

She got up somewhat sore. "The years are unforgiving," she told herself. Like every morning, she opened the window to ventilate the room. Two kittens, warming themselves next to each other, appeared on the opposite sidewalk. Both of them with very big eyes, without stopping looking at her, as if hypnotized. An intense emotion had taken over her. She didn't know why. Maybe because it had been an unfulfilled dream throughout her life. Maybe because they were so cute, so small and in such a big city... He remembers that she ran to the refrigerator and that she quickly went down to the street, wrapped in an unprecedented agitation. She was going so crazy that she almost fell rolling down the stairs. What a joy! They hadn't left. There they were, very close together, like two Siamese twins.

Now, in her house, they are the first and her husband, from time to time, grumbles.
